REFLECT

OVERVIEW

Educational innovators are a driving force behind change for social good. They recognize that the dominant method of teaching, the feeding of facts, needs to be replaced by a new, more engaging method. From opening schools to the integration of technology into classrooms, there are many ways to improve education.

CONNECTIONS

Angela Santee '13 (Psychology, Ed Studies minor)

One of Santee's favorite classes at Middlebury was Adolescence, a development psychology class that piqued her interest in educational psychology, which led to the declaration of her minor. Santee continued to study education during her semester abroad at la Universidad Catolica in Montevideo, Uruguay. She was highly involved with social change on campus, participating in Relay for Life and serving as a DREAM mentor and Service Cluster Board coordinator.

Angelica Towne '08 (International Studies)

Towne helped found the program Educate!, a youth leadership organization that serves as an incubator for Ugandan students and young entrepreneurs. Already, 80 percent of the students who have gone through the education program have taken on leadership roles in their communities. Towne has generated an innovative course that aims to improve the Ugandan education system. The Ugandan government wants Educate! to help transform their national entrepreneurship curriculum, which educates over 25,000 students.
